

My father is the best father ever! When I gaze up at his smiling lips, warmth spreads through my body, and all the bad thoughts seemed to be washed away. His twinkling sea-green eyes are filled with happiness and joy. When he speaks, his voice is like a sweet, cheerful song ringing through my ears, making the air tingle. His bristly beard always tickles my face when he kisses me on the cheek, making me laugh and giggle. Sometimes, he stares lovingly at me with his bright eyes for a few moments, then he smiles and chuckles.

My father has taught me to be a responsible, trustworthy girl. In fact, if it wasn't for him, I wouldn't be the nice, sensible kid I am now. My dad always teaches me manners, such as to say “please” and “thank you” and “you're welcome.” He taught me how to be a smart, clever child, teaching me math and English. If he hadn't taught me how to write, I wouldn't be the excellent writer I am now, nor would I have been a great mathematician. There's only one person to thank for making me smart—my father!

When my father comes home from a long, tiring day at work, I throw my arms around him and he lifts me up into the air, spinning me around and around until we collapse onto the couch, laughing and giggling. Sometimes, he brings me a toy—like a teddy bear or a box of Lego. Whatever it is, I love it.

When I burned myself on my leg, my father stood beside me, taking care of my burn. Every morning, he took off the bandage around my leg and put a new, clean one on. He assured me everything would be okay, and stroked my hair gently. He called me when he was at work to check if my burn was okay, which it usually was. My father took my hand in his and promised me the burn would go away and there would only be a little scar left, and soon that scar would fade away too. When my father said this, I felt better and I knew that I would be okay. Slowly, after a month, the burn became a little scar. Sometimes I look at that scar, and I remember that I had burned myself, and my father had taken care of me.

My father is the BEST!
